NOTES ON FLOW PHOTOGRAPHIC GALLERY

Flow Photographic Gallery (FPG) will open in September 2019 as a new exhibition space dedicated to British documentary photographic prints.

The FPG will occupy the same space as Flow Photographic: a leading photographic print-making studio that was for years a fixture on Portobello Road. The new space in Kensal Green is just 20 minutes from Piccadilly Circus on the Bakerloo Line.

Opening on 15th September, the first exhibition Art London features photographs by Alex Schneideman, taken while working with Hettie Judah on a book exploring art in the capital, past and present. The exhibition is an intimate, behind the scenes portrait of London's art world and the artists who populate it, including Grayson Perry, Anish Kapoor, Tracey Emin and Mark Wallinger.

17 October will see the opening of *The Holiday Picture*s, a series of stunning, self-printed silver gelatin prints from the eponymous book by legendary photographer Paddy Summerfield (Mother and Father, Empty Places, The Oxford Pictures).

In late November the inaugural FPG Christmas Show will present affordable work by leading photo documentarians.

Flow Photographic Gallery will become a centre for anyone interested in the photographic representation of Britain's complicated, idiosyncratic and constantly evolving story.

QUOTE

Taking advantage of the new space, owner, Alex Schneideman, said "London is now a global centre for photography. British documentary photographers from legendary Magnum founder George Rodger to a new wave of visual storytellers like Richard Billingham and Anna Fox have offered the world a unique perspective that owes as much to the idiosyncrasies of British culture as it does to the long association we have with the development of photography from its birth."
